Joint Commission International standards specify that organizations must collect data as part of their quality improvement system. Five hundred hospitals, laboratories, and special programs in 53 countries outside the US have earned JCI accreditation. In order to be accredited, an international healthcare provider must meet the rigorous standards set forth by JCI. This is the world's most prestigious accreditation standard for healthcare quality and clinical quality improvement. You're Reading a Free Preview Pages 9 to 16 are not shown in this preview. At Vinmec: Patient safety is top priority. The panel's recommendations are refined based on an international field review of the standards and input from experts and others with relevant content knowledge. With the retirement of Joint Commission International's Library of Measures, JCI accredited hospitals could consider using The Joint Commission's performance measures for guidance on collecting data. Based on that, the hospital will have action plan for quality improvement accordingly. JCI develops standards with input and information from: Health care organizations Subject matter experts Scientific literature and industry guidelines JCI Standards Advisory Panel Other key stakeholders To maintain leading practices, JCI turns to its international Standards Advisory Panel, composed of experienced physicians, nurses, administrators, and public-policy experts. Not only does it enhance recruitment and staff education and development, it also assesses all aspects of management and provides education on good practices to improve business operations. JCI standards set JCI standards are comprised of 2 sets related to patient care and hospital management: Standards related to patient care: International patient safety goals Access to care and continuing of care Assessment of patients Care of patients Patient and family rights Patient and family education Anesthesia and surgical care Medication management and use Standards related to hospital management: Quality improvement and patient safety Prevent and control of infections Facility management and safety Governance, leadership and direction Staff qualification and education Management of information Vinmec is the only private healthcare system in Vietnam which has two member hospitals achieving JCI accreditation - the world's most prestigious accreditation for a safety hospital: Vinmec Times City and Vinmec Central Park.
